Being named an executor is a serious commitment. It can be a new and challenging experience, often charged with emotion and complicated by your own sense of grieving.

Acting as the executor for an estate involves a significant personal commitment. It's common for a relatively simple estate to require 12 – 18 months of your time to complete. An executor¹ acts as the personal representative for a deceased person and is responsible for settling the estate – also referred to as estate administration.

Estate administration happens under the watch and direction of the executor and brings to a close a person's personal and financial affairs. As the executor named in the Will, you are responsible to manage the estate from start to finish, regardless of the length of time required.

We often hear from people who have accepted an executor appointment without fully appreciating the time involved or the duties and responsibilities, much less the corresponding personal liability inherent with such a role.

As an executor, you are required to correctly interpret and carry out the terms of the Will, ensuring:

- all beneficiaries are treated fairly and equitably, and receive proper information and reporting
- assets are identified, located and protected
- debts, liabilities and taxes are discovered, and paid
- investments, real estate holdings, creditors and business interests are properly managed, and overseen
- estate assets are distributed to the correct beneficiaries in accordance with the terms of the Will and any applicable legislation
